Organisations possess technology to collect, store and process vast volumes of data. However, they are often stymied in their efforts to translate this data into meaningful information that can be used to improve business processes and decision making. The cliché, "drowning in data and starving of information", seems apposite. The reasons are often related to issues which collectively form an emerging field, 'information quality'. IJQ covers theories, practices, strategies, infrastructure, dimensions, modelling and tools for information quality in modern organisations.

Topics covered include:

- IQ strategy, policies, standards, concepts, measures, tools
- IQ assessment and verification, theory, models and methodologies
- Costs of IQ and cost/benefit analysis of IQ improvements
- Metadata quality problems and managing information as a product
- Information mapping and information sharing
- Information quality on the Web and Internet
- IQ in e-government, electronic record management and e-business
- IQ in data warehousing, data mining and supply chain management
- Success factors affecting IQ
- Empirical research and new research directions in fields of IQ
- IQ applications and case studies
- Corporate household data and customer data integration
- Data cleansing and reconciliation, data farming
- Trust, knowledge and society in the IQ context
- IQ education and curriculum development
